Son Has Mononucleosis, Mother Ask For Information on Disease

Question—My son was sent home from camp with mononucleosis. Could you tell me what this disease is? F.J.
 Answer—Mononucleosis is also called infectious mononucleosis or glandular fever. It is thought to be caused by a virus and is generally not a severe illness. Usual symptoms are low-grade fever, fatigue, sore throat, swollen glands, occasionally jaundice, and skin rash.

The common name arises from the fact that swelling of the lymph glands in all parts of the body is fairly characteristic. The disease is usually slow in onset and fever and may last for one to four weeks, although fatigue and glandular swelling may persist longer, especially in adults.

Q.—WE ARE having so much trouble putting our two-year-old son to sleep at night that it is getting me down. We have tried just about everything, it seems to me. I wonder if it is ever possible to use some kind of sleeping medicine.

A.—Almost all young children go through a period when they fight or refuse to sleep, just as many have similar periods of food refusal. Although usually of minor importance this refusal may sometimes become a major problem.

MUCH DEPENDS on parental attitude. If parents show concern, distress, or inability to follow through firmly in the management of the situation, the child is likely to seize upon it as a means of getting attention. Every child likes the limelight, and when he finds that struggling and crying make him the center of attraction he is apt to repeat the performance.

It is not possible to offer any dogmatic set of rules for solving this problem. Parents will do well to analyze the situation, seeking out possible mistakes in their conduct. It is always vital for parents to present a united front to the child. If a child has come to dominate the family, this situation must be firmly but kindly corrected.
